actia multi diag 2011 free downloadBinding of normal and neoplastic mouse mammary cells to murine extracellular matrix and basement membranes. The murine mammary adenocarcinoma cell line, 184-1D, and a murine normal mammary cell line, HC11, each exhibit a different adhesion pattern to extracellular matrices and basement membranes. The breast adenocarcinoma, 184-1D, was grown in monolayer culture, and the mammary normal cell line, HC11, in suspension culture. The two cell lines were compared with regard to specific binding to basement membranes and extracellular matrices (ECMs). The two cell lines bound with comparable efficiency to ten ECM components examined, namely, type I collagen, type IV collagen, laminin, heparin, heparan sulfate, entactin, fibronectin, vitronectin, and a basement membrane extract (BME). Both cell lines bound to vitronectin with similar affinity. The 184-1D cells bound to BME with a higher affinity than did HC11. Binding of 184-1D cells to ECMs was inhibited by the soluble ECM component, fibronectin, and by purified fibronectin. We have previously demonstrated that the binding of 184-1D cells to basement membranes was inhibited by anti-vitronectin receptor antibodies. The present data show that the two cell lines bind to the same components of ECMs and basement membranes. The difference in adhesion pattern between the two cell lines appears to be largely due to their different growth patterns in culture. In a groundbreaking experiment, a self-identifying member of the transgender community – and someone who used to transition to live as a woman – was presented with very clear information about his physiology. One day, two months later, he agreed to a series of tests that would reveal what his brain looked like while he was in the body of a woman. As a result, scientists had some insights into why transgender people have different brains and a greater risk for mental health issues than the average person. For the most part, the brain activity was much the same, but the self-identifying transgender woman had more activity in the right front part of his frontal lobe, one of the most developed parts of the brain that controls decision-making, emotional response and bodily self-awareness.
