In this paper we present a study of the growth of single domain FePt ultra-fine and nanocrystalline particles by means of an electron beam. The properties of the particles are tuned by varying the size, the concentration in Fe, the working gas pressure, the presence of a magnetic field and the temperature. Under these conditions we can change the ratio between the length of the thermal diffusion length and the thickness of the sample, L/δ . The system can behave as a homogeneous or a nanocrystalline particle. In the latter case we observe the same growth as in the case of homogeneous materials. In this case we can tune the structure by the use of a magnetic field, because the smallest length scale that the system can have is a domain wall, and thus a lower size limit is observed at the Curie temperature in bulk materials. In a call to the nation, the Vice President of the United States of America urged the citizens of this country to take part in this year's midterm elections, reminding them of their rights and duties as voters. Mr. Obama celebrated the small sacrifices made
