Alcohol is typically described as a drug that impairs the ability to inhibit inappropriate behaviours. A vast body of research has examined whether the effects of alcohol on inhibitory control act via impairments in 'top-down' control mechanisms or 'bottom-up' mechanisms (dopaminergic systems) of inhibitory control, or, alternatively, via an independent mechanism. In the current review, we first place the effects of alcohol on inhibitory control into a wider context, i.e. the broader domain of motor control. We then examine the various models of how alcohol acts on inhibitory control and the outcome of studies that have examined the evidence for these models. Finally, we briefly outline a number of notable methodological issues that need to be considered in research examining the effects of alcohol on inhibitory control. The review of the literature does not support a model of alcohol's impact on inhibitory control in which alcohol acts via impairments in top-down, or 'executive', control. Rather, evidence suggests alcohol's impact on inhibitory control occurs via a 'modulatory' effect on 'alert' control systems, such as the alerting capacity of the cholinergic system.Q: Python - Slice dict of Dicts based on key How would I go about slicing a dict of dicts by a key?
