DUBAI (Reuters) - Drone operators have launched a campaign to stop the Saudi Arabia-led coalition using Israeli-made drones in Yemen after a coalition member fired a laser at one of the aircraft, risking an explosive warhead, video showed. On Friday, a video circulated online showed a two-propeller aircraft flying west of the port city of Al Hudaydah. The aircraft appeared to be a quadcopter or quadrotor, with its blades folded inwards. The plane was flying over open desert to the east of Al Hudaydah, and was illuminated by a bright laser beam at least 1,000 meters (1.6 km) away, according to footage uploaded by a user called "The War Nerd". Someone on the ground can be heard saying: "It's a drone." The group say they then heard an explosion before the recording cuts. "I was scared, I was very afraid, we were in the middle of nowhere," Yawar Marib, a resident of Al Hudaydah, told Reuters. Yemen's civil war pits the Iran-aligned Houthi movement against a coalition led by Saudi Arabia and backed by the United States and a number of other countries. In 2016, the Houthis shot down a drone belonging to the coalition during a ground attack on a residential neighborhood of the city of Sanaa, the Houthis' stronghold. It was unclear whether the laser incident that damaged the drone on Friday was also due to a Houthi attack. "The Civilian Drone Wing is calling on the Saudi-led coalition to follow international law by refraining from using any type of weapon or technology that could damage aircraft," The group said in a video statement. The coalition did not respond to a request for comment. A senior government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said earlier on Saturday: "We don't know who was responsible, but
