FastSmser [2022-Latest]

FastSmser is really the easiest, and the quickest way to send both messages and images to your cell phone. It's a main purpose to send text messages to cell phones from your PC. The application is quite simple to use, and is ideal for any Windows user. While the bulk of messages can be sent to more than one individual, the app works on any GSM phone. You can easily share pictures, and receive live updates of the status of your friends, or any other individual, through the application. The latter can be attached to your messages as an image, and can be sent immediately after sending the text. The app can be considered a miniature version of MMS, which is not really available for us in Lithuania yet. You can contact the manufacturer of the app at its official website. We read with great interest the article by Yadav et al. \[@CR1\], who showed that placenta-derived exosomes are able to induce the expression of chemokine genes in the human THP-1 monocytic cells. We also agree that exosomes from placental tissues could be a potential candidate for the treatment of neurodegenerative diseases, because previous studies showed their protective effects in neuronal cell lines. Placental-derived exosomes are recently reported to have neuroprotective effects in various neurological diseases including Parkinson's disease (PD) and Alzheimer's disease (AD) \[@CR2--@CR4\]. In addition, our previous study also demonstrated that placental-derived exosomes exhibited anti-apoptotic effects in the brain damage in a neonatal stroke animal model \[@CR5\]. However, we noticed a few issues regarding the effects of placental-derived exosomes on neurodegeneration in the previous and present studies. First, the concentrations of placental-derived exosomes used in the studies were very high ( $> 2 \mu\text{g/ml}$ ), and have been reported to be the effective concentration in various studies \[@CR1--@CR5\]. These high concentrations of exosomes are very unrealistic because they can be achievable in humans only through intravenous injection. Second, the neuroprotective effects of placenta-derived exosomes were not always investigated in the presence of anti-neuroinflammatory factors. Exosomes secreted from the placenta are known to contain various proteins a69d392a70
