Here we report a patient with Waldenström's macroglobulinaemia in a 67-year-old female, who had high globulins and hyperviscosity syndrome. The characteristics of the patient and the pathophysiology of Waldenström's macroglobulinaemia are discussed. The case is unusual because of the presence of paraproteinemia as a dominant disease process and the fact that there was a causal relationship between the hyperviscosity syndrome and the paraproteinemic process. the world from the very beginning of the telescope's operation. Hubble's success and longevity are remarkable, but development of the proposed Space Telescope is not fully complete. NASA will continue to seek new and innovative ways to improve this instrument. It is clear from the results of the Hubble Space Telescope that we can now do virtually anything in the visible and infrared band that can be done on Earth. But now that we know what we can do, we can do it faster and better. The new instrument will be able to image the sky with unprecedented detail, revolutionizing our understanding of the universe and the astrophysical processes by which the universe changes. This new vision is a powerful combination of beauty and technology that will make the universe accessible to everyone--at home, schools, and libraries. The iconic silhouette of a telescope and the astronomical images of breathtaking quality that are Hubble's powerful trademarks will serve as inspiration for students, making the Universe accessible to all people. And Hubble's powerful light will lead the way for 21st century scientists as they explore the structure of our universe and the history of its birth. The Hubble Space Telescope is an international project carried out by NASA and ESA, in cooperation with the European Communities. It's predecessor, the Hubble Space Telescope, was funded by NASA, 3e33713323
