Tissue repair is a complex, multifactorial process that is initiated by the action of proteolytic enzymes on the injured tissue. Elastin breakdown product, desmosine, is a well-known marker of tissue repair. Desmosine accumulates in the target area in response to various injury types, both with and without surgical stress, and its appearance may precede the deposition of fibrin.

This study investigates the possibility that desmosine and its precursor, elastin, are derived from the same precursor molecule and that, based upon the known cell lineage and composition of the vascular wall, desmosine is not produced by resting cells, but only in hyperplastic, proliferative cell types.

We propose to develop an immunohistochemical technique to detect desmosine in nonreparative tissue. We will test this technique on mouse and human tissues, and correlate the results with the tissue's histology and proliferation capacity.
Further development of this technique will include the use of radioimmunoassay to validate the immunohistochemical results. This technique is innovative in that it takes advantage of the ability of antibody reactions to bind to different cell types with different proportions of crosslinked peptides.

Desmosine, a structural component of elastic fibers, may be an important marker for early cellular events in tissue repair. The development of this method to measure desmosine will greatly aid in the study of tissue repair, particularly in vascular biology. Teodora Dzuga Teodora Dzuga (;
