Deadpool # 1 cover image. Deadpool # 1 (Marvel Comics) $99.99 (c) NYKO/MARIMARK/Marvel Comics. Neil Gaiman A: You can use library. It's more or less like a regular DBMS. But it is actually a way to store and retrieve all kind of information. All kinds of files, like bibliographic information, metadata, multiple formats, even PDFs. Depending on your size and needs, I see 2 options: You have to do everything by hand. In that case I would go with the traditional relational databases like SQL Server, or PostgreSQL. I recommend that. You don't have to do everything by hand, some kind of automatic generation makes things easier. One of these is Roximity. It offers to upload the text of your books into the cloud and gives you back pictures and all kinds of metadata. You can also add custom attributes for your books. It costs 199$/month. You can also check out Google Cloud AutoML Vision. It's a way of generating text recognition from images. It's free, but you have to publish the text it generates. A: You might also want to give libsvg a try if you're using Postscript or HTML for the front end or SVG or RTF for the back end. I doubt there's any distinction between what's considered valid and what's not (e.g. a line-break in a bibliographic field, that won't in a publisher's book description, etc. You can have a single RTF file with a publisher's markup and a single bibliographic field that contains the same information in HTML, right? libsvg does this translation between Postscript, HTML, SVG, RTF, plain text and more. Here's an image from their home page: source: Homepage of libsvg - a free, 2D, graph-based vector graphics library | Libsvg Wiki Also take a look at pdf2svg and pdf2html, and their man pages. It's pretty nice, if you just need to generate a rough PDF file from some text/HTML pages.

Also let's not forget Google Cloud AutoML Vision, but it's not free. export interface Matrix4 | /** * Specifies the translation of the object along the x 1cb139a0ed
