Needless to say, this comedy's most prominent feature is its verbal wit. All three letters, including the very first, contain four-syllable words that are packed full of clever sight and allusions. The strategy is perfectly mirrored in the ending, with two letters (E and Y) tied up with each other, forced to describe themselves. The film's settings range from the home in which the three letters are first written to the French military base where they meet the notorious Saragossa (a parody of the French Army). Beyond the sparkling comedy, there are also some cleverly conceived plot twists. Two letters, P and Q, write to the head of state complaining about the letter G, the queen of France. The queen, in turn, complains about the letter B (the letter that is not in the scheme). Q and B go on a verbal rampage against each other's incompetence, with G acting as a mediator, and then all end up in the military base, where they create their own army. It is amusing to see the queen, the only one who could really command the army, trying to hold her own against the letters. As for the letter B, it escapes prison and tricks G into signing their own death warrant. When B snips G's beard (another book-inspired gag), the letter S escapes as well. At the end, the letters find each other once again, but their newfound comrades are not quite as sympathetic as they hoped. Tillman's wit is on abundant display when he adapts a bit of Racine's Corneille's (representing the letter C): N'est-ce pas assez qu'on veuille encor donner un air de n'en plus(le bon Dieu) pour communiquer une lettre si vil. (sic). The film's visual whimsy is reserved primarily for the letters' interiors, complete with pseudorecipes. It is a masterpiece of domestic design. The most famous of these is the letter R, which is a structure built entirely of trunks. The film is also known for its geometric lens effects, such as the letter S, which changes shape into a star.
