Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an image forming apparatus, and particularly to a technique for switching a developer to be used for image formation. 2. Description of the Related Art In recent years, along with diversification of the environmental protection movement, voluntary measures such as the commercialization of dry developers have become popular. In an electrophotographic-type image forming apparatus, the application of a carrier and a dry toner is an important factor that greatly affects the lifetime of a photosensitive member and other elements. On the other hand, the application of a magnetic toner, which is a toner in which a magnetic powder is dispersed into a resin, is an effective means for suppressing the generation of a waste toner and other wastes that result from the operation of the image forming apparatus. There is an image forming apparatus that enables switching of a developer to be used. As an example of such an apparatus, there is a conventional technology, which uses an intermediate transfer belt with a coating layer composed of a material containing a magnetic powder (Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 2006-354,877). This is used when transfer is carried out from a photosensitive drum to the intermediate transfer belt. However, the coating layer can be peeled off the intermediate transfer belt with time, which results in the exposure of the magnetic powder. As a result, the obtained image is easily flawed, and leads to a decrease in image quality. In addition, the coating layer may block the surface of a photosensitive drum, which leads to the generation of brush-like discharge, and consequently to the image failure due to electrostatic attraction between the discharge and the image. Furthermore, in the case of a configuration such as the image forming apparatus having two photosensitive drums, in which the photosensitive drums are arranged at different positions and the transfer members are arranged on the opposite sides of the respective photosensitive drums, the intermediate transfer belt needs to be extended and wound at a different position depending on whether the front-side drum 3e33713323
