Combinatorial chemistry is commonly used in the development of pharmaceutical drugs. Combinatorial chemistry refers to the process of combining large numbers of compounds to identify promising drug candidates, often focusing on modifications to lead structures. Combinatorial chemistry provides a simple and economical way of rapidly synthesizing and screening many different molecules, but this comes at the expense of increased unpredictability and control. The production of libraries of small organic molecules is an increasingly important technique for the generation of promising drug candidates. For example, combinatorial chemistry techniques allow the preparation of organic libraries having thousands of different compounds. Such libraries are useful for high throughput drug screening programs and are also useful for the identification of lead structures in drug discovery programs. The most widely used techniques for generating organic libraries are parallel synthesis and split-mix synthesis. However, neither of these techniques provide an efficient way of generating organic libraries for screening programs. A combinatorial synthesis system would ideally have a high degree of reliability, consistency, and scalability. For example, in a combinatorial synthesis system, the libraries of compounds are typically generated by combining fragments in various combinations and at various ratios. The fragments themselves may be produced by some parallel synthesis or split-mix synthesis technique. Thus, the number of fragments which can be combined at any given time is limited. As a result, the number of libraries which can be produced by such a combinatorial synthesis system is limited. Thus, in order to obtain a significant number of libraries, the size of the fragments which can be combined and the relative ratios of the various components in the library must be reduced. This is particularly problematic for combinatorial synthesis systems which use increasingly small fragments. Moreover, one of the most important goals of comb
