Update Service on your computer ▪ Lets you check your current status ▪ Tells you the correct and safe commands to use in the Command PromptA hematopoietic stem cell requires a surface attachment that enables it to remain in an undifferentiated form, which gives rise to more than a hundred different types of blood cells. This stem cell surface protein has been identified as the CD34 antigen, and is a highly desirable target for cancer therapy. The CD34 antigen interacts with certain naturally occurring inhibitors, such as the sialylated glycoprotein P-selectin glycoprotein ligand-1 (PSGL-1). PSGL-1 is found in concentrations of approximately 0.5 μg/ml in normal circulating blood, but concentrations of less than 200 nanograms/ml completely block the binding of the CD34 antigen to its ligand. Since the concentration of PSGL-1 in malignant cells is often much higher than normal, the binding of PSGL-1 to CD34 antigen is a viable approach for tumor targeting. Other cells also express sialic acid carbohydrate residues. There is abundant evidence that the receptors for the Ad5 virus are to carbohydrate moieties on cell surface glycoproteins or glycolipids in order to infect cells. Glycosylation, particularly in the case of glycolipids, can be an important part of growth promotion or growth inhibition of cells. Fibroblast Growth Factors (FGFs) are a family of 17 polypeptide mitogens produced by a variety of cell types. They act on target cells via a cell surface receptor, one for each member of the family. The core binding domain (CB) is the N-terminal 51 amino acids of each FGF. The core binding domain interacts with the FGF receptor binding domain (FRIB). There are at least nine different FGF receptors on the surface of cell types. These receptors have different amino acid sequences, and show a wide variety of signaling affinities (Dlugosz et al., Cell and Tissue Research 278: 83-96, 2002). FGFs function in a broad spectrum of cellular activities, such as mitosis, tissue remodeling, angiogenesis, wound healing and cell differentiation. Human FGF2 is a 244 amino acid protein which has one N-glycosylation site at amino acid residue 153. In addition, FGFs
