A quantitative study of epithelial cell development in renal mesenchyme of the adult newt: persistence of mesenchyme and evidence of autoregulation. The development of the nephric epithelium in adult newts was investigated using light and electron microscopy. The study included the quantitative analysis of the occurrence of cell types, migration of epithelial cells and their proliferation, and, in addition, data on the number of cells and total size of the epithelium were collected. The study showed the following: (1) a limited range of epithelial and nonepithelial cell types in the adult nephron. (2) The appearance of cells was largely limited to the S-shaped body. (3) During regeneration, there was a lag phase of 1 day before the end of the lag phase occurred. (4) The epithelial cell types proliferate in all cases, but there is no uniformity in the proportion of epithelial cells that proliferate. (5) The epithelial cells divide once, although in many cases only part of the cell cycle occurs. (6) The epithelial cells migrate slowly in a saccular cytoarchitectural pattern, in agreement with recent work on amphibian nephron development, and travel to the tip of the S-shaped body. Migration of the epithelial cells of the cap ended at the end of the lag phase. (7) The number of epithelial cells and total size of the epithelium remained constant throughout regeneration. The cells were found to exhibit evidence of a limited autoregulatory control over proliferation. This is the first report to investigate the development of the nephric epithelium and we suggest that this model system may be useful for the analysis of regeneration in other epithelia.

Why Its So Difficult to Win a Sport Why It's So Difficult to Win in Sports Being a sports fan is a lot like buying a luxury car. You want to see your team win every game no matter what the score is, while simultaneously rooting for the opponent. This is the highest form of sport fanaticism. Step one. Become a sport fan. Step two. Grow accustomed to high expectations. Step three. You ♦
