Morbidities and treatment preferences for breast cancer among women from the Swiss federal canton of Bern. The purpose of this study was to collect sociodemographic, clinical, and treatment-related information from women with primary breast cancer in a Swiss Federal State, and to describe morbidity and treatment preferences. We performed a retrospective analysis of data from the Cancer Registry of Bern (n=1052) and of tumour registry data from 1999-2002 (n=1054). More than 85% of women had invasive breast cancer, the median age was 60 years (49-72 years) and the majority had estrogen-receptor-positive tumours. Treatment preferences included conservative surgery (77%), radiotherapy (86%), and chemotherapy (82%). Overall morbidity was high (n=603): radiotherapy (26%), type of surgery (19%), type of systemic therapy (17%), pain (16%), lymphedema (15%), and scoliosis (13%). High morbidity was associated with younger age, higher tumour size, less often a previous breast-conserving therapy, and no radiotherapy. There were only small differences in age, tumour size, and resection margins according to treatment preferences. Prevalence of symptomatic axillary lymph node metastasis was highest in patients of younger age. Morbidity is high in women with primary breast cancer, and previous breast-conserving therapy is associated with low morbidity. Prevalence of axillary metastasis was highest in younger women, and the rate of axillary dissection was lower when radiotherapy was omitted. The relationship between an older person's hope and the sense of meaningfulness, quality of life, self-esteem, and psychological morbidity. To explore the relationships between hope and sense of meaningfulness, quality of life, self-esteem, and psychological morbidity in relation to older persons' sex, age, and health status. The study was conducted using a cross-sectional design and a consecutive sampling technique. A community sample of 310 older persons (mean age = 71.6 years; standard deviation [SD] = 5.4 years). Instruments used were the Sense of Meaningfulness Scale (SMMS), the abbreviated version of the 13-item Hope Scale (HS), and the Self-Esteem Scale (SES)
