Let's be honest, it's a great way to figure out how to use your tools and an even better way to get your foot in the door. Let's face it, if you're moving from a software tool or if you're looking for a new job in a field that uses Photoshop, you should know the basics to help you land the job. This comprehensive guide covers the basics you need to know about Photoshop, what types of jobs you might get after you learn the basics, the best way to prepare for an interview and, maybe most importantly, the best way to sell yourself and your skills. What You Need to Know before You Start You'll need a copy of the software along with a mouse, since you will use most of it with your mouse. You'll need to know that you can use the mouse to click, hover, zoom, scroll, rotate, resize, edit, and move objects. You may find it best to copy objects between apps as well. You can use the keyboard to activate more features, including file formats, keyboard shortcuts, layers, and text. You will need to have a folder for the images and graphics you plan to work with, and you will need to know where to save each copy of the file you create. For example, the default location to save your files in Photoshop Elements is: %USERPROFILE%\Pictures\Elements\Files Because of this, you'll want to have a folder that is convenient for you to save your images and graphics in. You also need to know which folder is associated with the software you are using. Understanding Photoshop Files and File Formats You will be working with Photoshop and Photoshop Elements with graphics, images, and document files. What's New In Adobe Photoshop CS5?

The present invention relates to the field of paper making and in particular to a web tensioning device in a papermaking machine and process for the papermaking process, which by means of one or several tensioning devices for the paper web to be produced, adjusts the tension of the web on the way from the headbox to the drying section and the more particularly towards the drying section. In the production of paper, which is likewise manufactured from a suspension of fibers, the web, i.e. the paper sheet, must be wound up by means of a winding machine. In the papermaking process, which includes the production of paper, the raw material, i.e. the suspension, is refined by way of a headbox in order to produce a uniform flow of the suspension for the web formation. The headbox and the web forming system are arranged in such a manner that the flow of the suspension is guided in an essentially horizontal direction towards the web formation. The web forming system includes a forming board through which the suspension is passed, a wire screen through which the web is guided and a headbox, in which the flow of suspension is distributed to the forming board through a gap which is perpendicular to the direction of the suspension flow, i.e. to the longitudinal web axis. The suspension, which is guided through the gap and past the forming board and the wire screen, is brought in the longitudinal web axis under pressure by means of a device which is also referred to as a shoe. This pressing device generates the so-called head box pressure and serves for adjusting the desired flow through the gap. The aforementioned device can have such a construction that it comprises one shoe for each gap through which the suspension flows. The suspension flow or the suspension flow per gap can have such a construction that each suspension flow is passed through a gap and flows around in a U-shape or a V-shape to two branches where the flow splits further, e.g. for a corresponding gap. Also there is the possibility of an overall suspension flow which splits in such a manner that two suspension flows, which are arranged parallel to each other, are formed which then flow along parallel to each other. A shoe which presses the suspension through a gap is also referred to as a forming shoe. The forming shoe is also referred to as a forming element in the context of this invention. To obtain a desired quality of the produced paper, the shaping of the suspension by means of the forming shoe is also referred to as "equipment control"
