A modified version of the concealed priming method was used to explore whether subliminal emotional stimuli induced fear, anger, sadness, happiness and disgust. Fifty-two subjects were exposed to five brief silent video clips of emotional facial expressions. The subjects were asked to watch the clips and to detect either a happy or a sad (or neutral) emotion, while electro-oculography (EOG) was used to record eye movements. The subjects were unaware of the intention of EOG recording and were asked to carry out the detection task as quickly and accurately as possible. The mean latency of the first reaction in the EOG period was approximately 150 ms and the detection time was shorter for happy expressions than for other emotional facial expressions. This indicates that subliminal emotional stimuli induced fear, anger, sadness, happiness and disgust. These results provide some evidence for the hypothesis of subliminal facilitation of emotional information processing and also of the development of a multidimensional theory of emotional brain function.The mining boom has seen Australia's biggest city break the 500,000 population barrier, but a familiar hip-hop instrument will not be heard in its streets for the first time in four decades. Sydney, where an estimated 100,000 teenagers dance and listen to hip hop every weekend, is declaring itself Hip Hop free – a musical heritage with a rich link to its history. But unlike the city's quota of metal graffiti artists or the recent explosion of alternative rock, hip hop is supposed to be here in the first place – in the opening line to a Go 09e8f5149f
