The aim of this study is to determine the effects of a cardiorespiratory exercise training protocol on the oral cavity in young adults with a history of myocardial infarction. The study group included individuals with a history of myocardial infarction ($n = 20$; age 36.2 ± 8.6 years, 14 men, and 6 women) who completed an intensive 3-month period of aerobic exercise training. Afterward, individuals without training history participated in the same training protocol (control group; $n = 10$; age 36.6 ± 9.8 years, 7 men, and 3 women). All participants had clinical evaluation of the oral cavity and musculoskeletal system that included a gingival index, plaque index, periodontal probing, probe depth, and pain threshold tests. Also, anthropometric data and resting blood pressure (BP) were measured. Results revealed that after the training period, the percentage of inflammatory and bleeding events were similar in the experimental and control groups ($P = .579$ and $P = .549$, respectively). The gingival index decreased significantly from 1.27 ± 0.42 to 1.10 ± 0.40 in the experimental group ($P = .018$) and the gingival index remained unchanged in the control group ($P = .138$). The plaque index showed similar results, decreasing from 1.42 ± 0.54 to 1.25 ± 0.38 in the experimental group ($P = .025$), and remained unchanged in the control group ($P = .612$). The periodontal probing revealed a change in the initial plaque index, where the area under the curve (AUC) increased from 1.3 ± 0.4 to 4.4 ± 1.0 mm in the experimental group ($P = .008$) and remained unchanged in the control group ($P = .091$). The probing
