10^3 cm^{-3} , which is about 4 times the critical densities for the $\text{SJ}=1-0\text{S}$ line (0.17 M_{\odot}). The source may be a young massive stellar object (YSO). Massey et al. (1995) found out the existence of a main-sequence star with an OB-type nucleus in a star-forming region of 30Dor. It's interesting to note that the electron temperature is higher in the star-forming region than in the cloud far away from 30Dor. This may be due to a heating process near 30Dor. 3. We can see from the CO data that the molecular hydrogen distribution is much more complex than the hydrogen distribution. 4. There are some indications that the molecular gas has higher velocity components than the atomic hydrogen. This seems to be related to the high speed molecular gas ejected from massive stars. 5. The CO line profile is skewed with a high-velocity tail. This is probably due to the stellar wind from massive stars. The higher the star's mass, the higher the velocity of wind. 6. It has been seen from the CO maps that the CO lines from both sides of the peak have a broad wing which is obvious toward a particular direction. Therefore, we regard it as a proper motion of the molecular gas. 7. The fact that the expansion velocities of the molecular gas and the ionized gas are nearly the same may be due to an interaction between the expanding shell and ambient gas.
