Because of the strong effect that an individual's pediatric care has upon a child's wellbeing, it is very important for pediatric care to be delivered in a safe and effective manner. For reasons of the limited amount of medical care given to patients under the age of 18, many pediatric practices and hospitals utilize medical equipment whose size is beyond the capacity of infants and small children to safely manipulate.

Consequently, the increased use of all types of medical devices, including equipment that is intended for use upon children has resulted in an increased rate of misuse, which in turn has increased the likelihood of unwanted and sometimes serious injury to the child or the health care worker. By way of example, automated external defibrillators (AEDs) are commonly used in medical settings throughout the country. In their simplest form, AEDs deliver a defibrillating electrical stimulus to the chest of a patient in an effort to correct a potentially lethal condition known as ventricular fibrillation. AEDs are designed with a maximum patient load capacity of 375 Watts. In an effort to eliminate the possibility of injury to the patient and the health care worker attending the patient, certain AEDs have been designed to be used only in the delivery of the electrical stimulus. However, there remains a risk that the defibrillating stimulus may be delivered to the patient and the health care worker in the event that the AED is unable to deliver the electrical stimulus. In such instances, the AED is adapted to include safety circuitry in an effort to minimize the possibility of injury to the patient and the health care worker. In one known safety circuit, the output of the AED is monitored and if the AED senses a failure of its connection to the patient, the AED delivers a pre-programmed electrical stimulus to the patient to attempt to save the patient. In another known safety circuit, the AED is modified to provide a "quiet" mode of operation wherein the AED only plays a pre single tone of a pre

Ports: 20 Jan. 2015 Android v1.0 Screenshots: I'm just recording it all: a bunch of minor particulars about my life as a grad student and various cute, weird, or disappointing things that happened recently. Friday, December 15, 2011 Death row It has occurred to me that I might be the only person in the world who is willing to go to the Maryland Death Penalty Museum at the University of Maryland for a free day. Maryland is the only state in the country which uses this barbaric practice, so it makes sense to go down and see the things that this particular branch of the criminal justice system produces. So this year, I'm going on the Maryland Death Penalty Museum Day, held February 10th. Their website says they are "Celebrating the life and times of death row prisoners" and they have a bunch of exhibits, ranging from the obituaries of prisoners to childhood drawings. There are exhibits on death row history, the development of the death penalty and the politics surrounding the death penalty. There's a display on "the whole death penalty process", including the actual executions. There's a display on "laws and legislation" surrounding capital punishment in Maryland. There's a display on "Incarcerated by choice", which are places where people on death row are housed. There's even a bit about the plea bargains they've had as well as about how the death penalty isn't the only option. And of course, last but not least, there are some "biographical sketches" on the current prisoners on death row. First up is Freddie Gray. I like him. He's no sociopath, he didn't try to kill anyone and he's saying pretty much everything he could say to make sure he receives a fair trial and sentence. But I'm going to guess that most of the people who are interested in this are people who have heard of him and don't really know much more than that. If you're like me, though, then you've seen a lot of coverage of him and c9d1549cdd
