Poisson-shock wave interactions in jets of incompressible, low-density fluid The interaction between a Poisson-shock wave solution of the full Navier-Stokes equations and a Mach-cone shock wave has been studied. The relations between the propagation speeds, velocities, widths, and radii of the interacting waves are deduced. For some wave configurations the interaction is totally destructive, resulting in a cooling wave of enhanced density. Conversely, in other situations the interaction gives rise to reconnection with a new wave of enhanced density produced in a region of reduced density. The Mach-cone on the boundary of the cooling wave is quite distorted, with the Mach cone itself partially destroyed. Finally, in another set of situations, the Mach-cone shock wave is annihilated and replaced by a pair of identical pulses, each consisting of a core of the initial Mach-cone and a tail of the Poisson-shock wave. A model of the system is also given in terms of a hyperbolic integro-difference equation in one dimension. listening to songs of note Month: May 2014 So, this is not a rhapsody about my favorite songwriter.
