"One of the great things about creating FIFA is that the engine allows us to take an idea, play around with it and share it with the world," said Peter Rydell, Creative Director at EA SPORTS. "We are bringing this opportunity to create a new title to life through official partnerships and the support of the real players who embody these virtual worlds." On the pitch, soccer fans are experiencing the thrill of being on the pitch and experiencing the emotions of being on the pitch, using the official video content from the High 5 Series and the Amway EGL Sports Marketing Series. The EA SPORTS Football "Pro-Am" content will be expanded to include a full season of matches. Pro-Am data will be created and will be shared with the community so soccer players, fans and developers can learn more about the game. "HyperMotion is a fantastic way of animating a player's running/jumping or passing animation without being able to physically run," said David Teller, HyperMotion Technical Lead, EA SPORTS. "The movement in the game is incredible. From passing, to jumping and even the on-ball animations are the closest one can get to feeling what the player is experiencing in real life." "The technology is very precise," said Bruno Maiberger, Executive Producer for FIFA. "And it's the biggest thing we have created yet. It's the combination of the physical animation the game has in its DNA, added to the motion data from real football players, which creates an authentic and more realistic experience. This level of detail is what we've envisioned for the game and what our fans want." Front page image: Support for the MLS license has been launched on the new Madden NFL mobile game. The new Android based NCAA Football mobile game will support the entire NCAA Football video game license, including the Power 5 Conference licenses that bring the best and most realistic gameplay to the mobile player. "We are excited to be bringing the most complete and high-quality licensing experience to mobile through the EA Sports platform," said David Ismailer, Vice President of Product Management at EA Sports. "We're looking forward to adding new team, player and conference licenses and continue to deliver a
