The technology captures the natural movement of players and then replicates that movement on-screen, making it feel more real. Players' individual movements will also be more accurate, as they will react realistically to the movements of players around them. The challenge of capturing the movements of players comes from the need to balance the accuracy and realism with the need to keep the data collection and processing time as low as possible, which is why the team has turned to a new technology to enable the gameplay to be done with fewer numbers of cameras. FIFA in the Real World Footprints started in March last year and continued through until February this year, capturing around 200 million data points from about 400 players. The game requires five or six football players for each team, so the team has collected data from a variety of players to cover all possible situations on the field. FIFA 22 focuses on genuine responses to specific types of moves, tackles and passes, as well as the authentic dribbling and other player control moves. The data captured during the season also included over 1.6 billion passes, and this data has been used to refine player actions. A number of the game's new players are now collectively known as the Player Intelligence Team (PIT) and they have created new improved player reactions for the game. Examples of player interactions that are now more realistic include:

- Improved head contact collision
- A more realistic dribbling mechanic
- Improved AI-driven tackles
- Improved animations when players who are not selected as a viable replacement are fouled Improved animations when players over-commit to challenges Improved goal kicks Improved AI-driven tackling Improved animations when players are struck by opponents Improved contact between players at higher speeds Improved animations when the ball is manipulated with feet Improved collision detection at player interfaces Improved cameras for a more immersive experience The new technology includes a camera system made up of two high resolution cameras (three cameras in the case of the goalkeeper). The goal area is in front of the camera, and one camera faces directly to the side, to cover all angles from which the ball may come. From this combined footage, the motion capture system will gather data on individual players and combine this with other data it captures from server logs and offline matches, where high-resolution cameras were used. It creates a player model that accurately replicates the players' movements in the game using these data. The system scans players to ensure they are accurately tracked across the
