e06811. Leading article {#sec1} ===== The discovery of massive parallel gRNA libraries was a major breakthrough in CRISPR/Cas9 editing. The widespread use of these libraries enabled a rapid pace of introducing mutations into mammalian genomes. Nonetheless, they are not perfect. As shown in [@bib1], one of the major issues for in vitro cell-based systems was that library bias could influence the resulting mutagenic spectrum. Although the accuracy of using in vitro gRNA libraries for genome editing could be promising in some cases, the robustness remains to be established. In a recent paper published in eLife, [@bib2] present data suggesting a bottleneck in the CRISPR/Cas9 genome editing process. They report that the use of in vitro-selected gRNAs did not lead to the expected increases in the incidence of mutations in targeted regions of the mammalian genome. Instead, they show that the selected gRNAs generate a mutagenic spectrum biased to repeat sequences, such as transposons. This creates concerns about the robustness and reproducibility of the use of in vitro-selected libraries for genome editing. In the study of [@bib2], very few gRNAs were tested in vivo. Therefore, the library source is not a concern as long as every single gRNA was selected from a population. On the other hand, the gRNAs tested in vitro were introduced in an extrachromosomal plasmid, which could lead to false-positive results. A major issue in the study of [@bib2] is that, at least to our knowledge, they used 5'-phosphate-dependent crRNAs. These crRNAs have a heterogenous
