_If you want to practice this tool, try using transparent red, brown or brownish gray pigment to draw over the top of a photo, where you don't want them. See the following two examples. Photoshop's Pen tool works very similarly to the Brush tool. In the same way that you can use the Brush tool to paint or erase, you can use the Pen tool to make freeform shapes on the canvas. Pen tools are particularly useful for drawing and creating special effects such as fractals, bevels, shells, and veils. Try to use a small brush and then zoom out to make the texture more noticeable. The Gradient tool lets you make a variety of colors continuously change across the image. For example, you can make the background of a photo gray, then have only the foreground colorful, or vice versa. You can even make the colors "zigzag" down the image, resulting in a cool ethereal effect. The Gradient tool is ideal for making a gradient mask, in which colors other than black and white fill in the mask. The Blur tool is used to soften edges and sharpen focus. It can also be used to create a very soft gradient in Photoshop. Blur masks can be used to increase sharpness in the background of an image. You can use the Blur tool to create the effect of drawing with a pencil, pasting the drawings into a separate layer, and then showing them. You can create lighting effects in Photoshop using the Surface function. Surface masks can be used to make fine adjustments to lighting effects that are used to alter the look of photographs. Photoshop's Surface function is your best bet for making subtle lighting adjustments to your images. The Healing tool is a useful feature that can be used to remove spots and other blemishes from images. It can also be used to minimize problems like "zebra" coloration. This is a common problem in photos taken with color film. Using the Healing tool with "relaxation" settings is a great way to remove imperfections. You can use the Selection Brush tool to select only a portion of an image. You can then make any changes to this selection, including using Eraser tools to remove the selection or undoing edits to the selection. You can use the Selection Brush to select objects or areas of an image in order to make changes to the surrounding areas of the image. You can

More Than Cosmetics – Why Self-Care Is The Essence Of Feminine Beauty It's a moment that every woman dreads; the moment when her face is naked and staring at her in the mirror. It's an aspect of Feminine Beauty that remains a source of embarrassment because women have failed to embrace it. During her time as an assistant make-up artist, Patricia* would squeeze her hand into a basin of ice water (or would suffer the horror of being subjected to a "mud bath" to numb her face), pamper her skin with creams, potions and masks before a big night out. She was the ultimate example of Feminine Beauty. The secret to her over-the-top beauty regime? Self-care. Under the watchful eye of her mother, she'd spend her evenings sipping on cocktails and spending her time skin deep, nurturing her look and beauty regime. It was the essence of Feminine Beauty and if anything, she was the poster girl for Self-Care. As the mother of a teenage girl, Patricia was clear about what makes a lady. "There is no greater honour than to be a woman," she says. "It is your right." Some weeks would go by with her vacillating between being angry and being carefree. A sense of pride, self-worth and confidence blossomed in her during these moments, a glowing sense of Feminine Beauty, which she practised every day and still does today. From her early days in India, Patricia recalls: “The women in my community are very feminine. When I was growing up in Bangalore, my mother would dress me up in lovely dresses that she would sew. She would also treat me like a princess. It was only when I moved to Australia and joined the corporate world that I began to feel ashamed of my appearance.” After struggling for almost a decade, she realised the only way to move forward was to let go of how others thought she looked. She created her own brand of Feminine Beauty and just fell in love with this new-found beauty. “I realised that there is no reason why a woman should not wear makeup and still be feminine.” She quickly rose to prominence in the field of make-up and found herself helping women in the workplace understand what it means to be feminine in today’s world.
