Gameplay-wise, the combat is pretty enjoyable, though the game could use a bit of touch up. New elements such as the ability to change enemy attacks around using character-driven commands like RNG Hunters, as well as the ability to re-charge your magic can give the battle styles a bit of a revival. Monsters used to be an absolute chore in the earlier days of the game. I don't know if they've done anything to fix that, but it's not as bad as before. 'ELDEN RING's survival mode is a decent form of muck-up where the enemies are scaled down. Though there are a large number of enemies, they rarely come close to the player (I think they were scaled down because the devs wanted to ensure that there wasn't too much lag) and with a little bit of creativity, clearing them would be a breeze. The game has a solid amount of replay value in terms of both the survival mode and side quests. The types of monsters are varied and there's enough variety to the side quest to give it a good amount of life. The side quests can be pretty entertaining and shouldn't take more than 20-30 minutes to get through. That's really the only downside I can see. Visual-wise, the game looks quite alright. In a nutshell, Tarnished looks like a reskin of 'THE ELDER SCROLLS V'. It's a bit too pixelated in the higher-level areas, but can look quite nice in some of the smaller dungeons. 'ELDEN RING' also has a bit of polish to it. The characters in this game are more animated than they are in many other games. The sprites do look a bit better than in other games, but are still not perfect in terms of a 'next generation' game. It's still very smooth and beautiful to look at. TL;DR With all that in mind, this game is definitely worth purchasing. I think it provides a good amount of content for its price. The best part of 'ELDEN RING' is its in-depth crafting system, as well as the fact that you can develop the kind of character you want and be able to enjoy your experience accordingly. If you're a fan of the genre, 'EL

What's new in Elden Ring:

A blog post updating our list of space-based games. Read on if you'd like to know if you're good at killing stuff. Random thoughts: It's always a pleasure to see a post where I haven't been mentioned before. Announcer v. 1.0 has returned and I've not been mentioned before:

Random thoughts: Onward. You will continue to see more and more of these posts! Fun trivia from Announcer's Launch Day, 25 years ago: I had already played the game in 1993, and the first one I actually post about is from 1994. Almost a full decade. There is a sad lack of precisely accurate French-language statistics, e.g.: "[S]ome 65% of French gamers never finish a game once they start it. These gamers seem to be very difficult to influence in that 95% of the titles published for them never seem to change their behaviors." "The average penetration rate is rather reassuring: 65% of the populations who would be gamers have computer or Internet access, which is slightly more than the corresponding rate in Germany." The published figures for French-speaking countries don't make much sense to me because they are so spread out, but I'll probably write more on this when I can translate it. "Chinese millennials are better at coding than their predecessors, thanks to their constant need to play mobile games, which teach game programming in a fun and easy way." "Despite a big French population... French gamers have a poor average level of qualifications due to the starting age of 12 in 2010." Graph

"Elderly" Face-off "Elderly" Face-off Ahah! No! You probably think I'm crazy, but look! This is me! Both of them! This is a tiny self portrait I doodled up for a class I'm taking in drawing - that is, comic drawing. It's my attempt to teach myself to draw faces. Teaching myself? That implies I've never learned. I'm sure I could've. I just chose not to. At least I think I have. My excuse is that I have a very limited attention span. I can do for about five minutes a day, then I have to switch gears. I could easily have spent my whole life drawing. Alas. I am also a chronic procrastinator. It's a waste of time and life to procrastinate. You don't want to do what you don't want to do, right? Well, if that was the case, I wouldn't be doing this drawing right now. Anyway, we were being instructed to do a self portrait, and I decided I wanted one myself. So I bought a book of beginner's drawing lessons online - the same one she had been taking. I bought the first seven lessons and sat down to start practicing. I could tell, from the first lesson, that it was too simple and easy for me. If I was to learn anything, I'd have to learn a different way. I bought lessons 10 to 15 and started again, and realized my self portrait could be so much better. There are some really great photoshop tutorials out there. These are some of the ones I follow. Even though it's been a while since I made one of these, I hope it looks pretty decent.
