I am a complete and utter sucker for sports drinks, especially for endurance sports. I love running marathons. I love drinking Gatorade. I love the taste. I even love the vomit afterwards. I love how it energizes me for hours afterwards. It is what I am most in love with on a long run. So you would think I'd be the first one to throw out a health nut for making himself sick and choosing a Gatorade with large quantities of electrolytes and sugar over water. That's what I would think if Gatorade had ever turned on me. But that hasn't happened. Despite my loyal use of Gatorade, I have never gotten sick from it. I have never even been offered a bottle of Gatorade after a race, let alone watched the race on television and seen the first-hand confirmation that Gatorade's sugary electrolytes have made my stomach blow up like a balloon. And that's because, like many others, I have found that Gatorade has a downside. First, it's not actually as effective as a pure water supplement. And second, it is most certainly not the best electrolyte-rich supplement out there. And because Gatorade isn't the best, but it's pretty damn good, many runners and ultra runners choose it over water. But what is the real benefit of Gatorade? An early study published in the Journal of Strength and Conditioning Research by a fellow named Pylant back in 2003 may shed some light on that question. The study was interesting, but I do have some issues with it. First of all, this is a study that was done in the weights room, not the obstacle room. No pull-ups, no chin-ups, no running. They just placed subjects in a weight room and had them lift more weights than they could lift in an ordinary weight room. And, second, the study was done in college students who were all male

What is the appropriate way of disabling the modify button on the form depending on the state of the checkboxes? I'd like the user to be able to uncheck the boxes to remove them from the grid but not be able to check the boxes to add them to the grid. A: There's no typical way to do this. In jQuery it is just: $('.no_favorites').prop('disabled', true); but of course this would need some more code behind the scenes. It's pretty simple though. This program represents an important contribution to the knowledge of the functioning of the pineal gland (see separate applications by Dr. Lillie, Dr. Lillie and Dr. Urban). The fact that the pineal body responds to light and darkness and that it may function even in man in controlling certain functions, makes it possible that this gland may have a definite function in the control of certain basic physiological processes (cardiovascular, thymic, hepatic, muscle, etc.). By the use of our new light-scattering technique (light scattering spectrophotometry), it will be possible to detect and
