A chilling audio excerpt from one of the sickest murders in New York City history. On July 29, 1976, a "person of interest" — the suspect was later identified as George Markvors — was grilled by detectives on a murder he had just committed. In what has become known as the "Strangled Jogger," the suspect had stopped his auto on a lonely, country road in Brooklyn. He was on the run after attempting to hijack a car he found by the side of the road. He panicked, and when he realized he had no money, he turned to a nearby parked vehicle. According to the Daily News, he then grabbed a woman who was driving the car, shoved her out of the car and asked her where he could find some money. He picked a nearby guardrail, strangled the woman and then returned to his car. He drove away. But he had some trouble with the steering wheel, so he decided to drive into a nearby pond. He refused to emerge. Those were the last moments of the woman's life, but police were on the case. After six days of searching, they finally found the car. They also found a bloody fingerprint matching the man they were looking for. Police brought him in for questioning. First, they asked him to take a lie detector test. He refused. When his lawyer
