New findings show that cybercriminals are getting better by the day, their ability to change with each development and their imperative to keep up. The report by Kaspersky, "The Latest Wave of Cybercrime" features a number of examples of new tricks used by cybercrooks to harm their victims. The report also cites a growing issue of viruses from paid cyberattack services and how they are able to evade anti-virus protections. The report states: "In recent years, the phenomenon of increased competition among Hactivist groups, legal hacktivists and cybercriminals has been foreseen. This fueled a series of attacks by organized criminal groups...". State-sponsored espionage and cyberattacks most often come from China. China has been known to seek out the largest and most destructive cyberattacks, according to the publication. The country uses a number of different methods to steal information. One of the most popular among companies and large organizations is the use of fake IP addresses. Fake IP addresses are used when the attacker is located in a different country and spoofs a business's address. China has additionally been involved in the development of Zero Access Programs, which are essentially backdoors to networks and infrastructure. There are limits as to how the program is made, why it is made, and how the program can be disabled once it's developed. The programs are typically used by China to facilitate surveillance and access to systems while countries like South Korea and the United States are at risk. The worm then uploaded and started to run some type of backdoor that potentially made unauthorised actions. It then creates itself as a system executable file and is used to execute the malicious program. The vulnerability was introduced by the security firm WatchGuard,
