I am already aware of a Transform TFT (TFT) that maps the data input of the TFT to the data output of the TFT. My research has lead me to the term end-to-end transform (E2E TFT) and I am wondering what exactly that is. I am aware that this fits in the TFT category but I do not know what it is exactly used for. A: The definition of an end-to-end transformation seems to be: An end-to-end transformation (E2E) is a transformation of topological data (T) which is defined over the edges of a graph, such that it is possible to get an existing transformation T' over graph G' which is essentially as optimal as T while possibly using less resources. In other words, for E2E transformation, the edge data is transformed to the same edge data but possibly in a different order. For instance, an E2E transformation may swap 2 adjacent edges so that their initial order doesn't match. Or it may interleave horizontal and vertical edges in one pass. Or you may perform multiple E2E transformations before using the original TEG cell as a non-multiplexed memory. On the software side of things, you'll need to find ways to generate the data order that optimizes the number of TEG cells used for the transformation of data (this should lead to the best overall memory solution). The data that is being E2E transformed may be coming from many different sources which can be seen as graph nodes to which edge data is input. For instance, for the aforementioned E2E
