[Subcellular localization and substrate specificity of human apolipoprotein B-specific microsomal transfer protein]. Transferring of lipids to microsomal membranes is known to be mediated by the lipid transfer proteins (MTPs). The existence of a specific MTP for apolipoprotein (apo) B-containing lipoprotein family is indicated by their lipid-transfer activity. In this study, we sought to find out whether apo B-specific MTP is present in human liver. After the immunoblotting with polyclonal antibodies specific to apo B-lipoprotein fractions, a single band at 21 kDa was found in the microsomal fraction, but not in the cytosolic fraction. Moreover, we examined its substrate specificity. The synthetic peptide representing amino acid sequence 1-100 of apo B-48 was found to be the MTP substrate, and the peptides corresponding to amino acid sequence 451-561 and 632-666 of apo B-100 were weakly transferred. The results indicated that apo B-specific MTP is present in human liver and that the amino acid sequence 451-561 and 632-666 of apo B-100 is the MTP substrate. Evidence of a specific thalamic projection to the pericruciate cortex in the cat. The aim of the study was to clarify whether the thalamic projection to the pericruciate cortex in the cat is specific, i.e. whether it targets a given part of the pericruciate cortex or rather it is widespread. The retrograde transport of horseradish peroxidase was used in conjunction with selective lesions induced by the stereotaxic injection of kainic acid and ibotenic acid, in order to reveal the thalamic input to the pericruciate cortex. The patterns of retrograde neuronal labeling observed suggest that the thalamic projections to all parts of the pericruciate cortex are discontinuous. The distribution of retrogradely labeled cells in the thalamic nuclei was similar to that previously described using anterograde tracing techniques, with the exception of a distinct projection from the ventroanterior complex to the dorsal part of area 7d. The existence of a non-specific thalamic projection to the pericruciate cortex in the cat provides a basis for describing the anatomical and functional relationship between the two cortical regions.
