Browsing a BlackBerry device that has been seized by authorities as part of an investigation of cybercrimes, WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange reportedly showed up dressed in a tuxedo and a bow tie and accompanied by British police officers armed with rifles. Assange, who was being held at the Belmarsh high-security prison in London, was wearing the clothing to demonstrate that he was in fact being "arrested" by the British, according to reporting by the BBC. The reason for such a dramatic presentation was to help him prove that he was under arrest and could be extradited to Sweden, where he is wanted on allegations of having sex with a woman who doesn't want to publicly name the alleged partner because of privacy concerns. Assange has denied the charges and has vowed to prove his innocence. "A demonstration by Mr Assange of the type of treatment he can expect if extradited to Sweden in accordance with British law will be the first part of his defense case," his legal representative, Mark Stephens, said. "The tuxedo and bow tie are not standard issue for the British Police, they are intended for a formal event, such as a ball or dinner." The move to dress him in formal attire was a marked contrast to his arrival at the Ecuadorian Embassy in London earlier this month, which was marked by his being greeted with street signs, banners, crowds of cheering supporters and much fanfare. Assange was afforded a similar reception when he showed up for a court hearing in London on Thursday. The judge, said it was unlikely that he could move Assange out of the embassy for 3a67dffec
