In recent years, improvements in the function, capabilities, and performance of a variety of electronic devices have led to a demand for higher integration of circuits, higher performance of electrical wiring, and high density of mounting and packaging of semiconductor chips. These trends have also led to further miniaturization of a variety of electronic devices. Such electronic devices generally use a resin substrate that is flexible and lightweight. The use of a substrate made of a material other than glass may be advantageous for manufacturing an electronic device because of its flexibility. As such a material, a resin substrate having flexibility, such as a polyimide film or a polyester film, has been used. A polyimide film has higher thermal resistance and is chemically stable. Therefore, it is used for a substrate that supports a semiconductor chip. A polyimide film, however, has poor adhesion to
