A follow-up study of the same cohort (with the addition of a working memory test) will be necessary to provide more comprehensive findings and enable us to examine the association between cognitive function and subjective well-being. Another limitation in the current study was the cross-sectional nature of the design. The limitation is the difficulty in ascertaining the causal direction of the relationship between memory complaints and subjective well-being. For example, if subjects who are experiencing a decline in subjective well-being see increased levels of memory complaints, this relationship could be secondary. Future studies could take a longitudinal design to address this issue. The present study also has a number of strengths. First, the use of a representative sample of older subjects enabled us to examine age-related differences in the relationship between cognitive function and subjective well-being. This study also could be considered an early attempt to bridge the gap between cognitive and subjective well-being, providing further understanding of how subjective well-being relates to the cognitive process. In conclusion, the present study revealed that age-related differences exist in the association between memory complaints and the components of subjective well-being. Specifically, in the younger age groups, subjective well-being was associated more strongly with memory complaints than the older age groups. This suggests that subjective well-being is more related to cognitive function in the younger population than in the older population. This study was supported by a grant from the Korea Healthcare Technology R&D Project, Ministry for Health, Welfare & Family Affairs, Republic of Korea (A080588) and by the Korean Society for the Study of Aging Science Grant (KSSA-RDA 2005-1).
