Q: Node.js: require() with same package structure I have a codebase where we're setting up several environments for development, testing and production. Our package.json files are completely empty at this time, since we don't have a definitive idea of what packages we'll need to have built. The problem is, some of the packages (specifically, we're talking about Buffer and Buffer.ICU) aren't coming into the picture until we have to do something more complicated than just importing them as usual. If I add Buffer to my package.json file, I can require it just fine, but when I try to require Buffer.ICU, the request fails. The error is just Cannot find module 'Buffer.ICU' in my Node.js console. I'm assuming this is because I don't have the file for it at that moment, but I don't want to have to remove Buffer from the package.json file until I know that's what I need to do. Is there some way to require() a module that's not installed yet, if I can figure out its path? I know I can require a file by doing require('file.js') in Node, but I want something a bit more advanced. A: If I add Buffer to my package.json file, I can require it just fine npm install buffer --save but when I try to require Buffer.ICU, the request fails. That means you don't have Buffer.ICU in your dependency.json. Add the following to package.json: "dependencies": { "buffer": "^5.0.0" } If you want to wait for Buffer.ICU before requiring it, then you can do the following: "dependencies": { "buffer": "^5.0.0", "buffer.icu": "^2.0.5" } then you can now use the following to import: const {Buffer} = require("buffer.icu") const b = Buffer.from("foo bar", "utf8") If you try to use Buffer.ICU before you have a @types/buffer, you will get an error.
