Ask HN: Okay to ask about whether you are using JQuery? - cfontes I've been doing some QA on sites recently and just saw that those sites are completely javascript free now, I wonder why. Is it because they assume they are talking to someone who is using javascript and I am not? Is it because some websites have implemented JQuery so thoroughly they cannot live without it?I'm not really interested in debating in this post but just wanted to see if people got to know it before the next guy questions me on it. ===== aik It's because a large portion of the non-technical population use JavaScript libraries to style their pages and keep them from looking like crap on different browsers. This is a good thing.

~~~ ceejayoz How many people, though, are running IE6 and either don't know it, don't have the time/ability to track down a fix, or wish it to look like crap on their browsers? ~~~ jeff18 Obviously, if I'm running IE6, I'm not using

3 ways of implementing search API is better? I am implementing a search API. I have two options for this 1) The user types a keyword in the search box and the API send the keyword to a backend application which queries the database and returns the result. 2) The user types in the search box and the API returns a list of all the urls to a backend application. 3) The user types in the search box and the API return a list of all the urls to a backend application. Which one of these 3 would be better if used in production? A: As far as I understand, #3 is similar to Google Search API. The list of all the urls is presented to the user. In your case, the API returns a list of all the urls to the user's browser. The list of all the urls might be huge and hard to maintain. I'd suggest you to use Google Search API because it returns a static list of all the urls that are not too much for a user to handle while looking through all the list.

Very rare antimicrobial resistant Klebsiella pneumoniae-Klebsiella quasipneumoniae colonization. Matched collection of nasal fluid and transtracheal aspirate from a comatose critically ill patient revealed the presence of Klebsiella pneumoniae-Klebsiella quasipneumoniae colonization. The patient had no history of having been infected with those microorganisms previously. Antibiotic sensitive and resistant isolates were typed by PFGE and genotyping patterns were compared. Antimicrobial susceptibility tests for five antimicrobial agents (cefotaxime, imipenem, ciprofloxacin, ertapenem and gentamicin) were performed by the E-test and the disc diffusion method. One nasal specimen and two trache
