It is in this phase of passing the passwords to BeOS that I am currently stuck. How can I replace the program.. We try to crack the passwords, but some passwords simply do not work and they are not recognized as being correct. A: We are not that familiar with BeOS to give you a definitive answer here. But I'll provide some possibilities for your problem. You could try looking at the source code of sst. If this is enough to crack the secret 5 mode of encryption you'd have an idea of what BeOS does on the password (you might have to read some assembly code to get that). If you can't go down that route, you could take a look at this page: You could also write your own software that uses the RPC service on the BeBox. This is implemented in two ways: By using the TTY driver. This driver is the standard UNIX driver, so you'd have to hack the BeBox itself. By using a Java applet.

You'd have to read the documentation and determine what's going on, but this is how you'd have to get the password.

Q: How to disable auto-select tab and text-selection in Internet Explorer 9? I have a web page with EditText and Dropdown.

The problem is that when I type anything in the first EditText, the cursor blinks to the next EditText or Dropdown and select the text. I want to choose where the cursor stays. How can I do that? A: There's a myriad of ways to do this. As far as preventing double-selection, what may be the easiest is to make sure you have: `-pointer-events:none;` `-mso-user-select:none;` `-moz-user-select: none;` `-webkit-user-select: none;` `user-select:none;` in the css for the elements you don't want selected (ie. selects for html). It might be a good idea to make sure the onblur event has the same properties. IE9 doesn't (yet) support pointer-events, so, here's a set of properties that I'm using for IE9: .disabledSel {
