Since you're not sure why you have a pain in the butt in your back, you may want to go to a chiropractor. If your pain is more widespread, or if it's been a while since you've had a chiropractic adjustment, you may want to schedule a visit with a general practitioner who specializes in musculoskeletal conditions. Treating your pain depends on the cause, which you can't always tell. Some tips for you: * Take ibuprofen or other nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) as needed. * Use ice packs or heat wraps on your back, as tolerated. * Avoid exerting yourself for 3 to 4 days following injury. * Monitor your back pain closely if you've had a recent fracture or surgery. It's possible that you have a spinal condition such as degenerative disc disease, a spinal injury, or spinal stenosis. It's important to get your back into proper alignment. A chiropractor can help realign your spine to prevent or ease pain. If you're in an accident, you may be at risk for severe injury or disability if the area of the injury is already unstable or has a damaged spine. Emergency care and stabilization of your spine as soon as possible will help preserve your mobility. If you're suffering chronic back pain, ask your doctor about ways to relieve pain. You have asked an excellent question, and the answer is that it really depends on the cause of your pain. Generally speaking, you may have to go to a chiropractor if your pain is persistent, if you've had previous back surgery or a back injury, or if your

The nuclear- and subcellular-cytoplasmic distribution of endogenous sialic acid was studied in normal, senile-accelerated and neoplastic rat tissues. The immunohistochemical labelling of the specific post-translational modifications of proteins associated with the cell surface and nuclear membranes provides a basis to evaluate the distribution of nuclear sialic acid. The distribution of the endogenous nuclear sialic acid seemed to differ between species and tissues. In our studies we tried to avoid any contamination during tissue processing. The endogenous nuclear sialic acid was identified in the lumen of the nuclei from a variety of organs and cells, and the predominant organelle was the glandular cells of the stomach and pancreas, but the highest concentrations of the endogenous nuclear sialic acid was found in the nuclei of the hepatocytes. The best immunohistochemical criteria for the detection of nuclear sialic acid were a chromogen that remained stable in formalin-fixed, paraffin-embedded tissues. The endogenous nuclear sialic acid was detected in rat livers after removal of the hepatic lobes, indicating that the endogenous nuclear sialic acid may be an important constituent of the nuclei. In contrast, the cell-surface sialic acid was identified in the cytoplasmic membranes of liver, spleen, pancreas and stomach. You currently have javascript disabled. Several functions may not work.
