We blame our own shortcomings on our circumstances and on the outside forces that we perceive to be restricting our freedom and success. The irony is that nothing can ever be more important than our own sense of purpose. And nothing can ever be more limiting than our perception of our own capability and our own ability to excel. The greatest part of your success is not your money or your possessions or the car you drive. The greatest part of your success is how your personal life, and how you view your personal life, is reflected in your external achievements. At any level of your success, your personal quality of life is the ultimate reward. And it is the most difficult of all things to attain because it is the most personal. While outward success is measured by material or monetary value, the true measure of personal success is determined by the quality of the relationships we develop. If you have a spouse, children, and a career that makes you feel respected and valued, you are a success. In our business, we call this "personal satisfaction." While money provides the material means to a fulfilling life, it does not fulfill us. In fact, if you want a true measure of your financial success, you should be happy with the fact that you have enough money to take you through at least one more year of living. What you do next will define your life. If you are not satisfied with what you have accomplished in your business, in your career, in your family, in your personal life, then you are not financially successful. The great lesson of life is that success does not come from outside ourselves, but from within ourselves. What others think of us or their reaction to us is of absolutely no importance. If you are afraid of failing in life, then you have already failed. If you do not want
