Q: Ideas for connecting to web service I am new to Web Services. I have to do the following, is there any ideas to implement the same. Let's say I want to connect to the web service. First, I want to get a common sessionID, then I'll populate my UserID from the Database(I already have the UserID). Is there a way to pass the sessionID from the web service as input to my application, so I can populate my UserID(autoincrement field) without doing it in both the application and web service? Any ideas? Thanks in advance.

A: It sounds like you need to have a different method than the webservice for whatever server-side problem you're trying to solve. As you've discovered, it's easy enough to make a web service call from the client with SOAP requests. But you don't have to do this - you can make a web service call from the client without using SOAP by making a simple HTTP request. But you can't get your sessionid that way. If you do have a single web service call and you need to call it from many different applications, you'd be much better off using a web services enabled data storage engine - perhaps a relational database. Instead of passing your SessionID in as an input parameter, just use the SessionID in your stored procedures, queries, etc... The same SessionID would be available throughout your entire application. If you're going to have a web service call for each service call you need to make from your application, and if you're going to be wanting your user to be able to call your web service multiple times within one session, then you should really stick to a web services solution. Investors made bullish bets on U.S. stocks for a fourth straight
