the researchers are currently looking to make a similar design to reprogram young fibroblasts in the skin to produce muscle cells that could be used to repair damaged hearts. to that end, the researchers will be manipulating the chemical cocktail in the mouse's diet to change the effect the reprogramming chemicals have on the cells. andrew smith, an assistant professor of mathematics at penn state who is developing a human cardiomyocyte reprogramming method for his own startup, cellular reprogramming corp., said his goal is to develop cardiovascular implants that reprogram patient's own cells to replace those that have been damaged or worn out. ross, the mizzou math department head, said the research paper is important to student mathematicians, because the study is the first investigation of nonlinear waves and the first study of how many waves can be coupled through space, in addition to how the waves interact with one another. ross, mo. the idea behind quantum chaos is that complex behavior emerges from simple interactions. for example, when two billiard balls collide, a ball will bounce off in a random and unpredictable direction. to avoid overwhelming our brains with a complete set of possible faces, our brain needs some way to compute how close a face is to the "self-face." what it needs are specialized neurons that encode a single distance in the face space, as the distance between one person and another varies from face to face. and that's what we found by systematically recording how face cells behave when they are exposed to all imaginable faces. these distance-encoding face cells are just as numerous as the identity-encoding cells, and they are just as specialized, encoding each axis of variance independently.
