Recent evaluations of school breakfast programs show that these initiatives increase student participation, consumption of healthier foods, and overall academic performance (Brownell, Kirwan, & Saavedra, 2006; Carol & Sarafian, 2000; Wolf-Nielsen, 1999). There is a debate on whether this link is causal or correlational. In one study, consumption of healthy foods is the highest among students who receive free or reduced-price meals, in contrast to those students who do not receive school meals. However, there is little evidence that school meal programs are ultimately responsible for increased dietary intake, as there is a discrepancy between what students would select at home and what is served at school. In terms of school meal programs, recent studies find that cafeteria food is more palatable to students when the menus are low in sodium (Cohen, Richardson, Austin, Economos, & Rimm, 2013; Rimm et al., 2017; Williamson, et al., 2013). Food preferences of students have been shown to change with age, and there is evidence to suggest that there is an interaction between food preferences and school meals with better nutrition choices at school dinners and better eating patterns at home (Iyer et al., 2011; Williamson, et al., 2013). There are various factors that can influence food preferences at school such as food availability, the cultural value of the food, its familiarity, and others. This can lead to different nutritional requirements for different students, as they may not have the same food preferences. There are many interactions that can occur between the students and the social environment of a school meal program, including social structure, seating assignments, school rules, and time restrictions.
