If you're looking for the ultimate smart home solution, consider the HomeKit-enabled HomePod . Its biggest advantage is its Siri-powered voice assistant, which can turn on or off lights, cameras, and other smart home devices. It works with Apple's Home app, so users don't need to install third-party apps. Users can control the HomePod by voice through Apple's Home app, for Siri on Apple's mobile devices, or through the Apple TV. Siri has a similar set of controls for multiple smart home devices, so you don't need to tap on every different app or go through multiple screens to turn on a light. The HomePod also gives you access to all of your apps on your iOS or Mac devices. If you're building a new house, or renovating one, consider a smart thermostat. This is the most technically complex element of your home network, since it connects to every other smart device and appliance in your house. It also requires the most upfront effort to set up, which is why we've included both programmable and app-based thermostats like the Nest Thermostat E (Opens in a new window), which is designed to work with your existing home wiring, and the Dropcam Thermostat(Opens in a new window) that lets you use your smartphone or tablet as an always-on video camera. This way, you can monitor what the temperature in every room is at all times, no matter what. Do you put your significant other's dirty dishes in the dishwasher? The smart dishwasher will actually remind you to give them the hang of things. Some will also do the washing and drying for you. Whirlpool's Smart Clean is one of those, but we think its sleek design might be a little out of place in your kitchen.
