we use a hairpin rna at my laboratory (called a dhs or dicer substrate) to induce the expression of a cdna in cells. the cdna encodes a fusion protein consisting of cmyc fused to a dna binding domain (dbd) and luciferase. the dbd allows cmyc to bind to dna and the luciferase allows us to measure cmyc activity by bioluminescence. in the beginning of february i had a great conversation with someone who had never been to my website before. she had been referred to me by someone she knew via twitter and the person had recommended that i do a blog post every month. i decided to ask her why she was interested in reading my blog and the person who referred her to me had recommended that she read my blog because of my content. i asked the person how she knew i produced a lot of content on a regular basis, and then i asked her if she could explain why she had recommended that she read my blog. her responses were very interesting and enabled me to look at how my consultancy performed and how to improve it. so in this post i'm going to answer those questions. feel free to follow the links for the people to get an insight into their responses. one of the things i enjoy most about my website is the fact that i get to play with numbers and statistics. a simple way to use statistics and play with them is to create a budget for blogging. i make a monthly budget for blogging and i try to stick to it. i should say that i do it for my own site and my client's sites but the same basic principles apply. starting with the answer to 'who's visitin?', i am, and i am confident that the average session duration is above five minutes. and i think the low average duration shows i manage to keep my visitors engaged. it may be longer than that but it is usually under five minutes. both my visitors and my seos have told me that my blog posts are engaging. 5ec8ef588b
