When your pictures have been taken, it's time for post-production online. A huge number of video sites exist at this point. But what do you do if you're a still photographer? Photoshop has an Import Direct function that allows for quick sharing of images outside of the web. Configuration options and Adobe Expo Server are all that's needed to access the images that were purchased at the special rate. The new Export features allow for publication under the popular open source Ogg Vorbis format. And finally, when a photographer's honed her craft and stepped back to admire (and share) her creations through the PC, there's a vast array of online image sharing sites. But for casual or sporadic posting, sliders are often not enough. Users have their own tool: Adobe Image Experience Manager (AEM). This interface comes with a number of built-in editing features, built-in Web 2.0 features, support for RSS and Atom syndication, and more. Of course, additional tools are available if you want to use a third-party alternative. This image was done using the 5D Mark III. A tripod, slow shutter, a single lens, fixed ISO, AF and exposure settings, and a fixed f-stop were used. A half-white fill flash was used for the lighter subjects. Editing was done in Lightroom 5. All the images were saved at 1600x1200 pixels. The original file was 5.69GB and the JPG version was 2.34GB. The file size can be compared to Lightroom 4.2.0 with Log 2.2 using the same settings. In this case, we can see that Lightroom 4.2.0 generated two compression files, one of which is the same size as before and the other is about 3.75GB (about 5 times more). However, it may seem that Lightroom 5 produces much less-compressible JPGs. However, you may want to compare these stats to the original file sizes for this particular image since the original file was also RAW and shot at 4K resolution.]
