One interesting new feature is that "canvas size" has changed. Whereas before you had to manually change it via the Canvas Size menu, you now have to right-click on the Ruler and choose Units & Rulers, or go to Preferences > Rulers and Units. On the Image > Adjustments panel, the options found previously have been replaced with Sharpening, Crop, Shadows & Highlights, and Shadows & Highlights. These may not be particularly useful to seasoned Lightroom users who know full well the capabilities of these tools. However, I'm sure the addition of these exposure tools will provide welcome ease for novice Lightroom users who have been frustrated by the limited options available before. I'm leaving this until a later time, however, as I have heard some horror stories about the power of these tools and don't wish to add to pile of "need to avoid" this feature at all costs. Canvas size is now called Resolution, and yes this is what it's definitely used for. It will only be available for images shot in 3200×2400 or smaller. This may be annoying for some users, but since it initially was only available for those with 12MP or larger, you can understand my hesitation. As long as Canon provides the necessary information to pixel peepers who get annoyed by resolution quirks, I see no reason to hate on the hiccup. Impressed?
