The piece de resistance, as the mouthwatering headline would have you think, would be the new and improved Adobe Camera Raw. That's right, the largest overhaul in Camera Raw's history, with all of the bells and whistles you've come to expect from the unofficial Photoshop of RAW conversion. My initial take-away is that this version sports a new, crisp UI that's much more intuitive to use than in its previous iterations. From the one-point warp tool and white balance sliders, to the brand new histogram panel; this edition is definitely more akin to what I would consider to be a pro-level version of Photoshop. That said, one gripe I have with the UI is that the top left menu button is still located to the left of the screen. It's a minor gripe, but one that I hope that some creative optimization can be done for in the future. The silver lining to the improved UI of Camera Raw is deeper editing, and then deeper processing, with increased control over quality. No longer is color grading a hit-or-miss, and now everyone can contribute to the final look, even if they aren't technically "photographers. Apart from its continued pace of innovation, users will notice at least one major change in the latest version of Photoshop. Adobe hasn't released the content of the update, but they did "publish" a list of some of the changes. The changes include new features, new shortcuts and a number of memory, speed and bug fixes. In this new release, we are introducing an exciting new feature called "Automatic Spelling Correction." When used correctly, Autospell will automatically improve your editing, and it's already tested for high accuracy. To enable the feature, it's better to turn it on, than to wait for it. Autospell corrections can be found in the Status bar. If you have a corrected text, press Ctrl+V on your keyboard, to paste it in the image. If you don't have a corrected text, click the keyboard icon then press A to select All. Then, go to Letter, then Autospell on the main menu.
