United States, 5 Cir., 1947, 163 F.2d 340, a case involving a more narrow interpretation of the intent of Congress in enacting the conspiracy statute, we used language which, on its face, appears to indicate an approval of the concept of fraudulent concealment by the defendant. The Jones case was one in which a defendant charged with conspiracy to violate the narcotics laws was permitted to prove the truth of a transaction which he had previously denied. We said: 18 'There was no evidence of concealment of any part of the plan. The Government's position here was not unlike that of the defendant in U.S. v. Young, 7 Cir., 1941, 121 F.2d 180, 182-183. 'In such circumstances it has been held that the government may be required to prove that the offense charged was committed; and the defendant is entitled to an acquittal when he has established a reasonable, good faith belief that the transaction was other than as charged.' 19 'The Government has the burden of proof, and it may not avoid its burden by proving the truth of a transaction to which the defendant has testified. Thus, a plea of guilty which is in good faith and with which the defendant is satisfied may be treated as a judicial admission of all the facts alleged and established by the Government. If the Government then fails to prove them, this does not show that the plea was not in good faith or the defendant mistaken in supposing that he could not be convicted on that proof. See, also, U.S. v. Atkins, 2 Cir., 1938, 97 F.2d 851, 853, and cases cited therein.' 20 In the instant case the government offered no proof to contradict or meet the defendant's testimony of non-participation in the scheme to defraud. Instead it contended that the situation as reflected in the record and the defendant's self-interest justified the contention that the defendant did participate in the scheme. This is essentially a factual matter which is not provable by the use of the rule of evidence upon which the government relied in the Jones case. 21 It may be added that there is a two-fold reason why the Jones case does not aid the government's position. The main reason is that the case did not involve the question of fraudulent concealment. The Jones case involved an original prosecution and a reversal and
