In the typical continuous injection molding process, a thermoplastic material is injected into a heated mold where it is molded into a desired form. The molded web is then cooled in the mold, transferred to another mold and is further molded to a desired form. The continuous injection molding process is preferred for many uses. For example, the molded web may be used to make a sheet for use in a variety of different applications such as, for example, the manufacture of roofing materials, window and door frames, decking, wall paneling, insulation, and the like. This process has the advantage of producing molded products that have uniform thickness and are suitable for providing a particular finished look, as contrasted with the finished look that results from molding products by other processes such as, for example, the casting of molten or softened material into a desired shape. This process also has the advantage of permitting molding of materials that otherwise would not have been successfully molded in the past such as, for example, materials such as rubber, elastomers, or thermoplastic plastics, all of which have the advantage of being less expensive than metals or glass. The continuous injection molding process includes the use of a forming tool, which is a mold that may be heated to a substantially elevated temperature. After the plastic material is injected into the heated mold, the mold is opened and the molded material is removed. The heated mold is then closed and another mold containing molten plastic material is brought into contact with the first molded web. The second mold is also usually heated to a substantially elevated temperature. When the two molds are brought into contact with each other, the material that fills the two molds flows from one mold into the other, resulting in the formation of a web of material that is the combination of the two injection molded parts. The present invention relates to a continuous injection molding process in which the first molded part is directly connected to the second molded part. The connection between the parts is preferably made at the edges of the parts, so that
