But PrNG’s identity as a hotspot is in jeopardy. Scientists have realized that the forests in the region were once larger and wetter, but that they have shrunk by more than 90% over the past 7,500 years. Now, a recent study suggests that the loss of forest is threatening the biodiversity that makes the region unique. The results have important implications for conservation, the authors say, because forests that are already small are more likely to experience severe threats. The study was published on 30 October1 in the journal Science Advances. “It’s very concerning that we’ve potentially lost one of the most important areas for biodiversity,” says study co-author Dr K. Kerwin Knop of the Centre
