The tools that you use are clearly organized and keyed to their use. I have already spoken about this point in my Lightroom reviews. The new version, however, has brought some new features. You can now change the orientation of the image panels and Preferences window. This completely eliminates the problem of unwanted and unneeded overlays. Blacks are effectively blank spaces, allowing you to coordinate the colors of your design with the background. If you're working with a black and white photo, it might be necessary to select the areas of the photo that are completely white relative to the other boundaries. This selection is made with the color range on the right panel of tools. It's the same Designing tool of Graphics that we talked about earlier.
